Customer Reviews

A quick, enjoyable read about the legend of Modoc, the Welsh Prince. The story persists that he and his followers built a fortified encampment at the "Falls of the Ohio River", which is where Louisville, Kentucky & New Albany, Indiana are located today, and that they were driven away and may have all been killed by a native tribe, as retribution, after they had been warned not to build their home at this location. Did some survive, escape and then travel further West where they then became incorporated into the Mandan, tribe? Some members of this tribe were described as having blue eyes and light hair, and could speak some phrases in Welsh. There are unusual sections of walls located downstream, from Louisville that have given the legend a certain amount of local mystery and suspense, and you can find out more about this by searching the web. Its surprising how many people come to Louisville to research and speculate about the legend. The book contains the usual as well as some unusual and interesting aspects about this curious mystery that just won't seem to go away.

Thanks for the good read. I believe I am a descendent of this tribe. Or at least I want to think so in my story. I have done my families DNA and genealogy studies and it is quite fun to find out about family members.

When you think about it ,Columbus didn't even discover america.I have now got to question everything I've been taught by conventional methods.....

Factual papers very interesting.

Interesting.
